Move on Up

Often, the thing that catches my eye on the underground are the poems. Without getting sappy, it's a step into a little story rather than another repetitive bombardment about the science of beauty or hot hair in summer. Now Canary Wharf's new film programme of provocative and beautiful films made by animation artists from the last 20 years offers a nice little alternative to a steady sea of suits and commutes. Aiming to offer us new worlds or re-imagine the world we already know, artists include Run Wrake, Petra Freeman, Andrew Kötting and Semiconductor. After a year in the making, carefully chosen by four of the UK's largest film organisations and institutions, including new digital commissions and rarely seen films from the last century, the large-scale project will be on display in an unusual spot, but one well worthy of taking the suggested five minutes from a hectic routine. / Claire Taylor
